A better me starts at the desk

Late at night, the city is still lit up outside the window, and a man sits with one lamp, one notebook, and one pen. No one is watching. No one is paying him for this hour. He is simply learning, the way he promised himself he would.

Every January, people make big promises about money. Most are gone by February. What lasts is smaller: fifteen minutes with your numbers, one bill reviewed, one question answered. Discipline is not dramatic. It looks like a quiet desk and a person who shows up to it again tomorrow.
