Rise early, build slowly

Every morning at four, before the street wakes up, the lights come on in a small bakery. The baker does not wait to feel inspired. He mixes, shapes, and waits for the dough to rise, the same way he did yesterday. Nobody sees that part. They only see the bread on the shelf and the smile at the counter.

I think about him when people ask me how anyone ever pays off a home. The answer is not luck. It is the four o'clock alarm: one payment, then the next, then the next. Most of what we build that lasts is built the way bread is baked, one early morning at a time.
