Short story by Vikas Sharma

What flows to the next house

In the village, the water channel runs past every door. A mother washes at one end while the children splash further down. What she does upstream reaches them a few seconds later. Nobody in that village thinks of clean water as small.

Our homes are connected the same way. The habits in one house become the habits in the next generation's house. Paying on time, saving a little, asking good questions before signing: these things flow downstream. Take care of the water where you stand, and it reaches people you will never meet.
